FOREWORD

Seoul National University (SNU) stands as one of the most significant achievements following Korea's liberation. Although the country was placed under U.S. military administration after liberation from Japanese colonial rule, the establishment of SNU marked the first time Koreans gained an independent national institution of higher education created for Koreans themselves. Founded as Korea's first national university at a time when the country was among the poorest in the world, SNU was pushed to the brink of collapse by the devastation of the Korean War. Yet, guided by the aspiration to build a "University of the People," the SNU community overcame countless challenges. By the twenty-first century, the University had emerged as one of the world's leading institutions of higher learning. This exhibition traces the dedication and perseverance of generations of SNU members who made this remarkable transformation possible. We invite you to join us in supporting SNU as it continues toward its next miracle.

PART 1

Seoul National University was founded in the immediate aftermath of Korea's liberation amid national discussions on establishing a public university. It went on to overcome the devastation of the Korean War and pursue reconstruction and growth. Following postwar recovery and campus integration, the University established its identity as a large comprehensive institution in 1975 with the development of the Gwanak Campus. After transitioning into a National University Corporation in 2012, Seoul National University continues its global advancement, grounded in autonomy and responsibility.

PART 2

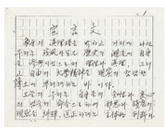

Seoul National University today stands upon a history shaped by efforts to preserve the Korean language and national identity during Japanese colonial rule, by wartime choices to set aside academic pursuits in service of the country, and by resistance that demanded democracy under military dictatorship. Across generations, students and faculty have responded to the call of their times, playing a central role in advancing Korean society.

PART 3

SNU is made up of many people. Beyond students and professors, there are administrative staff, campus security, cleaning personnel, and those who serve in cafeterias and campus stores. Together, these members of the community contribute to society through and beyond the University. SNU has produced leaders and innovators across academia, culture, science, the economy, and politics, all of whom have played vital roles in moving the world forward. Service and contribution define the University's past and remain its promise for the future.

CLOSING

"If one asks of the future of our nation, let them raise their heads towards Gwanak."

This well-known line by poet Jeong Hee-sung is familiar to every member of the SNU community. The phrase does not simply say "raise their heads towards Gwanak," but "let them raise their heads," a solemn call first voiced by the poet when he was a graduate student at the groundbreaking ceremony of the Gwanak Campus in 1971.

SNU must be a light of truth and,
beyond that, a light for the world.
